UMass Boston and Kennedy Library to Co-Sponsor Presidential Debate on October 3, 2000

By Anemarie Lewis Kerwin

For the second time in three years, UMass Boston has been chosen to host an historic event. On Thursday, January 6, the Commission on Presidential Debates announced that the University, along with the John F. Kennedy Library, has been selected to host the first presidential debate of the 2000 general election. The University and the Kennedy Library together were one of 12 finalists, nationwide, being considered to host one of the three debates, and one vice presidential debate. Scheduled for Tuesday, October 3, the actual site for the debate will be in the Clark Athletic Center. It will be the only debate site in the Northeast, and will be the first time in Boston's history that a presidential debate has been held in the city.

While several factors played a role in the University being selected to host the presidential debate, one factor in particular clearly gave the University the competitive edge. Three years ago this month, UMass Boston was the site of President Clinton's visit to Boston to unveil his $495 million juvenile crime bill. It was the first time in the University's history that a president of the United States visited the campus. Not only was the campus transformed to accommodate the 1,500 people who attended the President's announcement in the Clark Athletic Center, but it was able to provide the facilities, equipment, transportation, media access, parking and other requirements needed to successfully execute such an event.

CPCS Professor James Green Takes History to Heart

By Jeffrey Mitchell

What James Green calls "movement history" is both the substance and the subject of his new book, Taking History to Heart: The Power of the Past in Building Social Movements, forthcoming in May from the University of Massachusetts Press. By "movement history" Green means not simply accounts and analyses of past events, but the work of "scholars and activists," himself among them, who are "passionately engaged in the study of social protest for moral and political reasons, as well as intellectual ones."

Taking History to Heart, says Green, "is about ordinary people doing extraordinary things." It recalls such pivotal moments in the story of American labor as the Haymarket Riot (Chicago, 1886) and the Bread and Roses Strike (Lawrence, Massachusetts, 1912) and traces the ways in which these events have been remembered through the ensuing years. One chapter, titled "Releasing Silent Voices and Uncovering Forgotten Places in the American South," focuses partly on the civil rights movement; another, moving closer to home, considers "the Politics of Class and Race in Boston." The book explores such recent events as the 1989 Pittston Coal strike, and carries readers up to the present in a chapter on the labor union revival of the 1990s. Green himself often appears in the foreground, not only as a commentator but also as a participant—for example, in chapters on "Making Documentary Films about People in Struggle" at Henry Hampton's Blackside Productions and on his own work as a faculty member at UMass Boston's College of Public and Community Service.

This autobiographical approach is "unorthodox for an academic," says Green, "but not unorthodox at all in literature. I'm very much putting my cards on the table in each chapter, saying 'this is why I wrote this, this is why I care about this.'" Taking History to Heart is "a book about

Celebrating Black History Month
By Philip S. Hart, Director, Trotter Institute

In the African American community, it's a running joke that the month set aside to recognize and honor the achievements of this significant population is February—the shortest month of the year. However, this bit of humor in no way diminishes the importance of Black History Month, first conceived by historian Carter G. Woodson. Over the years, February has arisen to the moon to celebrate black achievement throughout the nation—thus we have seen all manner of individuals and events recognized during this period. The names range from Charles Drew to Booker T. Washington to W.E.B. DuBois to Mary McCloud Bethune to Colin Powell to Bessie Smith to Jackie Robinson and on and on. Some names are nationally recognized, while others are more regional in nature. Given our place at the University, I purposely did not spell out the specific contribution of each individual named above. Your job is to fill in the blanks. A bit of literary research or on-line investigation should do the trick.

The William Monroe Trotter Institute for the Study of Black Culture is concerned with the accomplishments of African Americans throughout the year, and has been of such a mind for nearly twenty years. Incidentally, if you do not know who William Monroe Trotter is, I again suggest some library research. Over the years the Trotter Institute has conducted research, published papers and a quarterly journal and generally presented the African-American community in all its facets to a local, regional, national and international audience. This work ranges from a published report on the status of blacks in Boston to an evaluation of one of the largest housing rehab projects in the nation to a report on media images of African Americans to a critique of Michael Porter's work on the competitive advantage of the inner-city to several reports on the status of black business in Massachusetts to work with local design professionals on a master plan for Roxbury. This list goes on and on. If you are interested in this important work, then plan on visiting the Trotter Institute and picking up one or more of our publications on these topics.

On a personal black history note, the Spring issue of American Legacy Magazine which hits the newsstands in February has a cover story on Bessie Coleman. This cover story features my work on the contributions of Bessie Coleman to American aviation history. In the past this same magazine has featured cover stories on Adam Clayton Powell, Jr. and Duke Ellington, among others. So as you can see black history can be seen from a personal perspective as well. February has become an important month for not only the African American community, but all communities interested in the significant contributions of this group to the nation and the world. Let us all enjoy the learning that can take place during February.

NEH Funds Professor's Work on Mars & Literary Imagination

By Anne Marie Kent

The place held by the planet Mars in our literary imagination has prompted the National Endowment for the Humanities to award Professor Robert Crossley of the English Department a $24,000 grant to research and write a book to be called Imagining Mars: A Cultural History.

Ever since humans began looking into the night sky and noticed the presence of the celestial bodies, they have been creating myths, theologies, and stories about Mars. But it is only in the last few hundred years that a body of scientific knowledge about Mars has accumulated. As scientists understood (and misunderstood) what they were observing, their reports fired the imaginations of writers who used the concept of Mars as a vessel to serve their varied literary purposes.

"I've been intrigued by the question of why so many science fiction writers wrote about Mars," says Crossley, "and how informed the fiction was when the literary imagination in sync with scientific understanding, when is it not, and why? If the authors didn't care about portraying Mars scientifically, what were they up to?" asks Crossley.

Crossley says that our own political, economic, and social concerns are reflected in much of the literature about Mars. As an example, he points to Ray Bradbury's Martian Chronicles, which he observes, was "designed not to predict the future, but to reflect the anxieties, aspirations, and values of Americans in 1950." Imagining Mars will survey the literature about Mars with special emphasis on the period from 1877 to the present, and will include chapters on how the Mars has been imagined by writers as a site for utopia, an extension of the American frontier, and as a laboratory for ecological experiment. He will also survey the accumulation of scientific evidence about Mars, and its influence on the literature. One individual central to the book is Bostonian Percival Lowell, an amateur astronomer who triggered a wave of interest in Mars with his writings on a Martian civilization "heroically resisting extinction" by engineering the "canals" observed on the planet's surface. The question of the canals' existence was finally laid to rest by the photographic evidence provided by NASA's explorations of Mars in the 1960s. Crossley traces his interest in science and the imagination back to his days as a graduate student at the University of Virginia, when he wrote an essay on the roles of the humanities and the sciences in education. University Hosts Service for Stanley Koplik

By Anne Marie Kent

As a lone seagull soared outside the Ryan Lounge windows, Cynthia Miles Gray sang "Panis Angelicus" before a silent crowd of over 400 at the January 7 memorial service for Massachusetts Higher Education Chancellor Stanley Z. Koplik. His death at age 55 brought together the Massachusetts higher education community to remember a leader known for his warm demeanor and steadfast commitment to upholding both access and quality in higher education.

All eight speakers offering eulogies—including Massachusetts Governor Paul Cellucci, former Commissioner of the Massachusetts Board of Education Robert Antonucci, and former Chairman of the Massachusetts Board of Higher Education James Carlin—noted the concern for all students that fueled Dr. Koplik's professional zeal. Former student member of the Board of Higher Education, Roger Limoges praised Dr. Koplik's "legacy of putting students first, of making us feel that we were the reason he went to work every day."

Among the mourners were University of Massachusetts President William Bulger, Board of Trustees Chairman Robert Karam, Massachusetts House Speaker Thomas Finneran, Lieutenant Governor Jane Swift, and Boston University Chancellor John Silber.

Prior to his appointment as Chancellor in 1993, Dr. Koplik served as Executive Director of the Kansas Board of Regents and Missouri Commissioner of Higher Education. He received his bachelor's degree in American History from the State University of New York at New Paltz, his master's in Public Administration from Higher Education from the University of Kansas.

Board of Higher Ed Report Cites Good News for UMass Boston

By Patrick Dwyer

In December 1999 the Commonwealth of Massachusetts Board of Higher Education (BHE) released the Enrollment and Admissions Summary Report - Fall 1999 which summarizes enrollment figures throughout the state system. UMass Boston has again shown a substantial increase in total undergraduate students, from 10,132 in fall 1998 to 10,579 in fall 1999. Including graduate students, UMass Boston's enrollment now stands at 13,778.

The BHE report also illustrates an increase in out-of-state students at UMass Boston - comprising almost 10% of the student population - and a minimal number of remedial students, well below the 5% allowable cap of the percentage of freshman enrolled in two or more developmental courses.

According to the BHE, UMass Boston has done well in light of increasing admissions standards across the state system. Of 2,379 new students for fall 1999, 674 were first time freshman, a substantial increase of 17% from fall 1998. Transfer students, by far the highest population of new students every semester at UMass Boston, increased slightly from last year (1%). 82% of new admits met the higher admissions standards, while 6% were considered "non-traditional" and therefore exempt from some requirements. Only 7% were considered "special admits" - exceptions to BHE policy.

Liliana Mickle, Director of Undergraduate Admissions, attributes these increases in part to increased visibility of UMass Boston. "Our image has changed for the better, both locally and nationally. The leadership of Kathleen Teehan [Associate Chancellor for Enrollment Services and University Communications] has helped focus the efforts of many departments at UMass Boston into a coordinated recruitment effort. She has brought to fruition many new initiatives and encouraged a renewed spirit of cooperation and collaboration at UMass Boston."

College of Nursing Graduates Receive Pins at December 21 Ceremony

The College of Nursing awarded pins, a traditional symbol of nursing, to eighty five graduates at a December 21st ceremony held in Lipke Auditorium. The graduates, some of whom are shown above, were addressed by Deans of the College Brenda Cherry, and enjoyed a reception for family and friends in the Wheatley Cafeteria. The College of Nursing traditionally holds a graduation ceremony for December graduates.

UMass Boston in 1972. An interest in British science fiction writer Olaf Stapledon turned into a fifteen years project resulting in three books: An Olaf Stapledon Reader, Olaf Stapledon: Speaking for the Future, and Talking Across the World: The Love Letters of Olaf Stapledon and Agnes Miller, (1913-1919). His work on Stapledon was also supported by an Endowment grant in 1989-90.

The Endowment awarded only twelve grants this year to individuals in Massachusetts, and of those twelve, Crowley's was one of two to be awarded in the field of literature and one of two awarded to individuals at a public institution.

Commonwealth Journal: A Public Affairs Show for Massachusetts

by Melissa Faeol

WUMB 91.9 FM is getting ready to re-launch the Commonwealth Journal, an exciting radio program which did not deserve its fate - the loss of federal funding that silenced the program after a successful initial stint from 1987 to 1992. Beginning in March, the station will add the reborn Commonwealth Journal to its program lineup.

The weekly program will focus on a variety of local and national cultural, social, and political topics, all from a Massachusetts perspective, featuring information pertinent to living in Massachusetts as well as commentary and insights from leading scholars and activists. The Journal aims to promote critical inquiry among Massachusetts citizens and to raise the level of their interest in and understanding of state affairs. It will explore issues related to social and cultural diversity, the humanities, politics, science, business, the environment, and education. UMass Boston's own WUMB-FM Public Radio network, with support from the Massachusetts Foundation for the Humanities, is producing Commonwealth Journal, each episode of which will comprise two or three 15-15 minute segments. The program will be distributed weekly to radio stations across Massachusetts, who will either air it in its entirety, or select segments to broadcast in conjunction with their own public affairs programming. Already, more than ten stations have signed up to receive the program.

The revised program's enthusiastic executive producer is WUMB-FM general manager Patricia Monteith. "We're trying to create topics and feature guests that are very exciting," she says. "Even if a topic doesn't appeal directly to a listener, we'll come from angles that will cross different disciplines."

The program host is also a UMass Bostonian: Dr. Elizabeth Sherman, senior fellow at the McCormick Institute of Public Affairs and director of the Center for Women in Politics and Public Policy. Sherman also provides political commentary on National Public Radio, WBUR, CNN, WBZ-TV, WHDH-TV, and WGBH-TV. She is often quoted on a variety of contemporary and social issues in major print media. With her diverse professional and educational interests, Sherman is an appropriate choice for host of the equally multi-form program.

What the folks at WUMB are especially eager to find out about is the audience's reaction to something the former Commonwealth Journal did not include: an interactive website. Previously, listeners responded to topics by contacting WUMB, where they were referred directly to the guest. Now, each individual station airing the journal can provide such information to its own listeners, and each station's audience will be able to participate directly in discussions on the program's website. Monteith anticipates that it will be up in about a month in the form of a virtual forum containing interactive chat, links, and information about program topics and guests.

Commonwealth Journal's planning committee includes UMass Boston Assistant Chancellor for Urban Affairs, Hubie Jones; Assistant Chancellor for Communications, Annamere Lewis-Kerwin; Director of the Massachusetts Foundation for the Humanities, David Telahid; and Executive Producer and General Manager Monteith. Elizabeth Sherman also maintains an active voice in topic planning.

Commonwealth Journal's first topic is to be mental health. In conjunction with Women's History Month, Ellen Rothman, from the Massachusetts Foundation for the Humanities, will discuss Dorthea Dix, a pioneer in improving conditions for the mentally ill. Another segment of the same program will address homelessness and the mentally ill, focusing specifically on the deinstitutionalization movement of the 1970s, which resulted in thousands of mentally ill patients being released from hospitals, many of whom became homeless.

Other initial topics will include a discussion with Sonia Nieto, author of The Light in Their Eyes: Creating Multicultural Learning Communities. Nieto will address the issue of communication between the Black and Hispanic communities. Roger Dell, Director of Education at the Fitchburg Art museum, will speak about the new, public art-based magnet school in that city, which integrates the arts into all areas of its curriculum.

What is truly unique and appealing about the Commonwealth Journal is its dedication to framing a Massachusetts perspective on local, statewide, and national affairs. Listen for it on your radio next month.
Ed Reform Prompts New Graduate Certificate

By Anne Marie Kent

As reports of MCAS scores dominate news headlines, a new 12-credit Division of Continuing Education graduate certificate program addresses the challenge the test poses to educators, particularly those who teach special needs students. Offered by the Center for Social Development and Education (CSDE), "Adapting Curriculum Frameworks for All Learners" provides educators with an understanding of the Department of Education curriculum frameworks and offers strategies for including students with disabilities in standards-based instruction and assessment.

Kelly Clark, Assistant Director of CSDE emphasized the uniqueness of the program: "First, we are the only center not affiliated with an academic department offering a graduate certificate. Second, it perhaps most importantly, graduate certificates themselves are the new wave in education." She explained, "Now a freshman's degree is like a high school diploma. More and more, people are looking for additional education to meet their professional needs. This program is a direct response to what's happening with MCAS. Over half of the current participants already have advanced degrees."

"Those participants are twenty five teachers, psychologists, and other staff from the Perkins School for the Blind. Sanford Hysong, who oversees staff training and development at Perkins, says that the program fills a significant need. "It's important for us to adapt the curriculum frameworks for our students."

Participants complete a series of two-credit courses designed to provide educators with practical applications of education reform, particularly with diverse student groups. The program reflects the mission of CSDE, which was founded in 1976 to promote quality education and social development for students of all ages, particularly those at risk for academic and social failure.

CSDE Director Gary Gipstein explained, "The Adapting Curriculum Frameworks Graduate Certificate is a unique opportunity for CSDE to respond to the changes in the Commonwealth with regard to Education Reform, fulfilling the mission of our Center of research to practice and practice to research while providing service to the public schools in Massachusetts."

University Seeking Higher International Profile

By Patrick Dyer

Many institutions in the U.S., from community colleges to major universities, are becoming increasingly global in their recruitment efforts; UMass Boston is making great strides in this area as well. Recruitment of students to UMass Boston has usually been a concentrated local effort, aimed at drawing students from locales within eastern Massachusetts. But one recent recruitment visit stands out as unlike any other ever attempted by the University: the annual conference of European Council of International Schools (ECIS) in Nice, France in November 1999. Peter Schilling, associate director of Undergraduate Admissions, attended the week-long conference and reports that, "with our questionnaire, participation with ECIS is beneficial to student recruitment. The overall objective was to put UMass Boston on the international map, to show that there's a world-class university in Boston where the tuition is less than $20,000 a year." "The ECIS Conference provides a forum for college representatives to promote their institutions to international guidance counselors. "I consider ECIS one of the most valuable places to recruit international students," said Schilling, who has attended the conference in past years as Director of International Recruitment for Emerson College. "Establishing a network of international guidance counselors is extremely important, and attending ECIS is a way to reach many counselors from all over the world in just a few days. They appreciate the opportunity to learn about colleges world wide where they can send their students. We wanted to connect with the guidance counselors at ECIS because if any had ever heard of UMass Boston."

Schilling believes that recruiting international students makes sense for UMass Boston on several reasons. "From a business perspective, these populations of students help maintain enrollment during the periods of ebb and flow of student populations at home. 15 years from now there may be a shortage of college age students, and having 'feeder's' outside of Massachusetts will ensure that the University meets its target enrollment of qualified students." Schilling also recognizes that diversity at UMass Boston is a driving factor. "As much as the term 'diversity' has become a bit cliched, it does help to have a student from Braintree High School sitting next to and studying alongside a student from Taiwan." The biggest obstacle in recruiting international students, according to Schilling, is "definitely the lack of University-sanctioned and administered residence halls which eliminates a certain segment of potential international students."

Schilling has overseen many other recruitment efforts of international students in his first year at UMass Boston, including visiting 18 embassies in Washington, D.C., communication with students through email or in person. "It's a big challenge for me, but the students are interested in learning about UMass Boston for students abroad."
The College of Management has signed an articulation agreeement with Merrimack College through which qualified undergraduates from the North Andover institution may complete an MBA degree at UMass Boston at an accelerated pace. Under the agreement, Merrimack business majors and recent alumni will have an expedited admissions process, provided they meet the competitive admissions standards of the College of Management’s MBA program. Students who have successfully completed an undergraduate business degree at Merrimack will be eligible to receive course waivers in the MBA program. College of Management Dean Philip Quaglieri, views the new arrangement with Merrimack as “an exciting new relationship that's smart management for each of us.” Dr. Thomas Dukes, dean of the Faculty of Business Administration at Merrimack, has signed an articulation agreement with Merrimack College. Dr. Dukes, who has held the position of dean since 1996, said the agreement is a significant step in strengthening the relationship between the two institutions. The agreement allows students from both institutions to benefit from each other's resources and expertise, and it provides a pathway for students to continue their education at a higher level.

MBAC Receives Certification from Association of Small Business Development Centers

The Minority Business Assistance Center (MBAC) at the University of Massachusetts Boston has been certified for three years by the Association of Small Business Development Centers (ASBDC) after a rigorous review process. The certification shows that the MBAC meets the criteria set out by the Association for leadership and organizational issues, strategic planning, client and stakeholder focus, program performance standards, staff and counselor utilization, and process management. The MBAC is one of the Centers of the Massachusetts Small Business Development Center Network, which is a partner of the U.S. Small Business Administration. The MBAC is the Commonwealth's Office of Economic Affairs, and the University of Massachusetts. Begun in 1985, the MBAC has provided over 2,300 clients with management training assistance and counsel to individuals seeking to develop a new business or expand an existing one. Since 1993, the Center has been located at UMass Boston College of Management and directed by Henry Turner, who was named 1997 Minority Small Business Advocate of the Year for the Commonwealth by the U.S. Small Business Administration and the Massachusetts Advisory Council.

Bringing the presidential debate to Boston was no easy feat, but it was brought to fruition by a collaborative effort between government officials, along with business and civic leaders. According to Chancellor Penney, Paul Kirk, chairman of the John F. Kennedy Library Foundation and co-chair of the Commission on Presidential Debates, contacted her in late June to explore the possibility of the University and the library co-sponsoring a presidential debate. Shortly thereafter, the Commission on Presidential Debates visited the campus to see if it met the selection criteria. In November, Senator Edward Kennedy and Mayor Menino hosted a breakfast for 35 corporate and civic leaders to raise the required $600,000 to host the debate. At that breakfast $335,000 was pledged and by mid-December over $540,000 had been raised. Organizations that have lent their financial support for the debate include Fidelity FleetBoston, Liberty Mutual, Boston Red Sox, Boston Capital, The Boston Herald, Citizens Bank, Greater Boston Convention and Visitors Bureau, NSTAR, Alan Solon, State Street, the Massachusetts AFL-CIO, Foley, Hong and Eliot, Ropes and Gray, and Asian American Bank.

"As an historian, I am delighted that UMass Boston was chosen as the site for the first presidential debate. Hosting the debate affords our citizens a wonderful opportunity to participate in the democratic process. It also provides a significant occasion for our students to witness this lesson in civic education," said Chancellor Penney.

A press conference was held on January 6 at the Kennedy Library to discuss the debate. Paul Kirk discussed the selection process, while President Billiger and Chancellor Sherry Penney discussed the logistical challenges of the University hosting this historical event. Speaking on behalf of the Boston business community was Paul Guzzi, president of the Greater Boston Chamber of Commerce.

According to the Commission on Presidential Debates, once the total number of seats is determined for the debate, a public announcement will be made about ticket availability and allocation.

Women in Community Development: Changing the Tradition from Poverty to Leadership

By Anne Marie Kent

Ethel Nixon sees herself as a leader and a teacher, but this is a relatively newfound identity. Just a few years ago, she was on welfare, and had abandoned nearly all hope of pursuing her college degree.

In 1998, however, she discovered a program designed to provide low-income women with the needed academic, financial, and peer support for college success. The program, Women in Community Development (WICD), is a collaboration among Project Hope, the Women's Institute for Housing and Economic Development, and the College of Public and Community Service at UMass Boston. Now Ethel Nixon is a WICD student and a WICD peer leader.

WICD participants—called "Mellow Scholars" in recognition of the program's lead funder, Mellon Bank, earn bachelor's degrees in such areas as human services, community planning, advocacy, and criminal justice, thus enriching those fields with women who have utilized services or who live in disinvested communities, and increasing the women's economic stability and independence. One quarter of participants are former welfare recipients. Many are single parents living in the Roxbury and Dorchester area. WICD funders include Mellon Bank, the Mabel Chase Fund, the Little Sisters of the Assumption, Polaroid Corporation, Boston Women's Fund, the Lenny Fund, and the Nelle Mae Foundation.

According to data from the 1998 Current Population Survey, workers with bachelor's degrees had average gross earnings of $40,478 compared to $22,895 for those with high school diplomas. As Professor Marie Kennedy, program director for Community Planning and Human Services explains, "Getting an education is a way to get out of poverty and to stay out of poverty. It has been proven time after time. The focus of the WICD program," she continues, "is not only individual development, but community development as well."

Designed also to promote leadership development, the program encompasses peer leadership and support: participants help one another. In her second year of graduate school at UMass Boston, program graduate Deborah Gray serves as WICD co-facilitator and mentor. Currently employed by Family Nutrition Center, Gray successfully secured a major grant to conduct parent workshops there. In Ethel Nixon's life, this individual and community development is well begun. Working her way towards a bachelor's degree in human services, Nixon says that family and friends have noticed a change in her and that the change has, in turn, motivated them to think seriously of college. The effect on her children has been most striking. "By going to college," she explains, "I have shown my children something. You do what you see your mother have done." Nixon and Gray are not the only proof that the program works. Since 1997, twenty-five Mellon Scholars, their ages ranging from 19 to 50, have begun college and two have graduated with honors and are pursuing graduate degrees. Seventeen are continuing their education. Six have left to pursue employment or other training programs. Ten are currently employed in their chosen fields.

WICD participants share struggles in attaining their education despite economic challenges, and the difficulties of juggling work, family and school. Peer support is developed through informal interactions facilitated by two participants at bi-weekly meetings at Project Hope. Gray explains, "Support has been financial as well as networking and helping each other stay in school." Raising five children with her fiance, Mellon Scholar Emma Kigoni, confirms the value of peer support: "As a single parent, you're rolling pennies, dealing with financial crises or sick kids, handling work and going to school...If you're on your own, it's easy to say 'I'm tired, I want to quit.' Here, there is support, someone to call you and offer you the encouragement you need to keep going."
An article by CPCS Professor Dennis Stevens of the Criminal Justice Program, "College Educated Officers," was published in the journal Law and Order (vol. 47, no. 12). Stevens also has a contract with Prentice Hall for the publication of Policing and Policing Partnerships, which will include 12 original research articles from scholars and practitioners. Stevens himself will contribute an article on how civil liabilities against police officers affect arrest rates. Twenty eight agencies across the U.S. have agreed to participate in the research for his study.

Public Policy Program alumna Maria Elena Latessa took a look at the Contractual Relationship Between State Government and Community Agencies, which has been published by Garland Press.

Randy Wilson, a student in the Public Policy Ph.D. Program has written a paper, "Health Care Coverage: Are we Shortchanging Those who Care for our Job Seekers." He has been published by Target Marketing's annual conference at the Ashridge Management Center, UK, sponsored by the State Government and Community Services. "Improving Dispute Resolution" was published in the December 1999 "Speaking Out" feature for the Advocate, a higher education publication of the National Education Association. Franko focused on the mission of higher education, particularly the role of business education, in support of the idea that a college education can teach students useful skills to help them become gainfully employed outside of academia or politics upon graduation. Two analytical articles on the 2000 presidential election have been published by the McCormack Institute's Center for State and Local Policy as part of its ongoing election coverage: "No Early Knock-out in the Gore-Bradley Battle" was published as an op-ed in the November 29 Boston Globe, and "Don't Place your Bets on the Iowa Results" appeared in the Concord (NH) Monitor on January 8. Both were prepared by Lisa DiNatale, director of the UMass Boston Poll, and Garrison Nelson of the University of Vermont and senior fellow, McCormack Institute.

Grants and Projects

The Greater Boston Manufacturing Partnership, based at the College of Management, has received two grants to continue a study of the impact of manufacturing on Boston's economy: a $30,000 grant from the City of Boston's Office of Business Development and a $10,000 grant from NStar.

On January 13, 1999, the night of the City of Boston one-night census of homeless persons, the McCormack Institute's Center for Social Policy staff worked with staff at the Pine Street Inn and Long Island Shelters to gather information on a random sample of individuals who seeking emergency shelter. The information collected from this snapshot was then analyzed in comparison to other statewide homeless information collected by the Center for Social Policy through the ARCHfiel Project.

Appointments

Paul K. Gilney has been appointed acting director of the Division of Continuing Education's Center for Occupational Education. Gilney was previously superintendent and director of the Southeast Technical Regional School in South Easton, Massachusetts. He is filling in for Center director Summer Rotman, who is on leave.

Professor Lawrence Franko of the College of Management wrote the December 1999 "Speaking Out" feature for the Advocate, a higher education publication of the National Education Association. Franko focused on the mission of higher education, particularly the role of business education, in support of the idea that a college education can teach students useful skills to help them become gainfully employed outside of academia or politics upon graduation. Dr. Peter McClure of Marketing presented a slide lecture, "China from East to West: A Fulbrighter's Journey" at the Harvard Law School on January 23. His presentation was sponsored by the Eastern Massachusetts Chapter of the Fulbright Association.

Conference and Presentations

Colin Rule, a graduate student in the Dispute Resolution Program, has an article, "Online Mediation: The Next Frontier for Dispute Resolution," published in SPOD News, a newsletter of the Society of Professionals in Dispute Resolution.

Conferences and Presentations

Professor Nina Silverstein, director of the McCormack Institute's Center for State and Local Policy, was been published by the McCormack Institute's Center for State and Local Policy as part of its ongoing election coverage: "No Early Knock-out in the Gore-Bradley Battle" was published as an op-ed in the November 29 Boston Globe, and "Don't Place your Bets on the Iowa Results" appeared in the Concord (NH) Monitor on January 8. Both were prepared by Lisa DiNatale, director of the UMass Boston Poll, and Garrison Nelson of the University of Vermont and senior fellow, McCormack Institute.

Honors and Awards

Professor Nina Silverstein of the Gerontology Program, CPCS, has been elected a Fellow of the Gerontological Society of America in recognition of her "outstanding achievement and exemplary contributions" to the field.

The Center for Social Policy, McCormack Institute, has been awarded a $141,000 grant from the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services to assess the impact of welfare reform on trends in emergency services. This project, one of two projects funded and the only statewide study of its kind, involves collection and analysis of statewide data and case studies of emergency service providers and recipients in six Massachusetts communities. The study will be conducted with The Institute for Asian American Studies, The Gaston Institute and The Trotter Institute.
